*In this work I will make some mistakes, not many.
Would you not possibly have made as many, or more?*

If you find a mistake, or omission, I would appreciate a letter correcting the same. Write it to me; don't tattle it to your neighbor, it will enable him to know how small you are.

In giving population, I invariably use the numeration made by the 1910 census, which in almost all instances were understatements. We have to have some standard.

This book will be revised, corrected and reprinted, at least, annually.

Respectfully,

EMMET STARR,

Claremore, Okla.

Oklahoma—County seat of Oklahoma county and capitol of the state of Oklahoma. Population 64,205. Altitude 1,197 feet. The name is derived from the Choctaw words: Okla, people and hum-ma, red, or literally red people.

Oklahoma—Formed from 3,250,560 acres of land purchased from the Muskogees for the sum of $975,168.00 and 2,169,080 acres purchased from the Seminoles for a consideration of $325,362.00 in 1866 by the United States. This land was opened by act of congress to public settlement on April 22nd, 1889. Under the "organic act" a territorial government became effective on May 2nd, 1890. This territory also embraced "No Man's Land" a strip of territory that had been ceded to the United States by Texas because it was free territory. The territory was divided by the "organic act" into seven counties, numbered from the first to the seventh, consecutively. The territory was also divided into legislative districts, the boundaries of which did not coincide with the county lines. Below I will give the original numbers of the counties, and the name chosen for each at the first general territorial election on November 8th, 1892.

Second county, changed to Oklahoma county.

Third county, changed to Cleveland county.

Fourth county, changed to Canadian county.

Fifth county, changed to Kingfisher county.

Sixth county, changed to Payne county.

Seventh county, changed to Beaver county.

Territory was added to the original until Oklahoma Territory embraced twenty-six counties. The territory existed until November 16th, 1907, when it became a part of the state of Oklahoma, which was constituted with seventy-five counties, and Harmon county was created in 1909. Population 1,657,155. Capitol, Oklahoma.

Sequoyah district, Cherokee Nation—Originally Skin bayou district, but the name was changed by act of Cherokee council, on November 4th, 1851, to Sequoyah district, in honor of Sequoyah, a late resident. The district was abrogated on June 30th, 1898.

Sequoyah—A half blood Cherokee-German, born about 1770. His mother was a full blood Cherokee, of the Paint clan, a sister of Co-a-to-hee, or Corn Tassel of Toquo, a signer of the United States Cherokee treaty of November 28th, 1785. Sequoyah's father was a Suabian trader from Count Zinzendorf's colony in South Carolina. But he deserted his wife before their son was born.

Sequoyah's first wife was Sallie, of the Bird clan, and his second wife was U-ti-yu. Physically he was some five feet, eight or nine inches in height, slight and sinewy, of light complexion, and his eyes were dark grey. He was slightly lame, from an inflammatory trouble of his early childhood. In dress he clung to the custom of his people, wearing the turban, hunting shirt, leggins and moccasins. He never acquired any knowledge of the English language. He always adhered to the religious beliefs of the ancient Cherokees. In early manhood he became first a blacksmith, then a silversmith, but in either, his usefulness was often marred by the love of liquor.

The prevalent idea among the Cherokees of his day was that the written page actually talked to the white man, for this reason they called it the "talking leaf." Sequoyah, noticing the strange cabalistic marks, conceived the idea that each one represented a word, but upon getting an English book, and counting the different marks therein, he soon saw that their number was inadequate to the expression of a language. In 1809 his meditations culminated in the idea that probably each mark represented a sound. To test this, he scratched with his knife on a stone, G, naming it wa, and E, which he called ku. This demonstrated to him the probable feasibility of his idea, as by these marks and the sounds that he applied to them, he represented the word wa-ku, which is the Cherokee word for a cow. At the same time he scratched out other figures, to which he gave the sequent sounds of tsa, qui and li; this being Cherokee for horse. By this time he was satisfied with the correctness of his idea. Thenceforward he continued to multiply, eradicate and change marks, to each of which he gave distinctive sounds. The form of many of the characters he adopted from the English book, although he misjudged their proper use in the original. As he became more absorbed in this work, he grew correspondingly more abstemious in his use of liquor. He announced to his friends that he was going to make the "leaf" talk to the Indian as well as to the white man. This, to them, was incredible, as they had no standard to judge by, and it exposed him to some ridicule, but not enough to keep him from being one of the signers of the United States-Cherokee treaty of September 14th, 1816. Only men of considerable merit were accorded this honor, as they were regularly elected for this purpose. His manuscripts were pieces of bark, his pencil a piece of charcoal. At one time his wife, becoming disgusted at his apparently useless dronery, consigned his entire work of several years to the flames. On his return he found his work destroyed. He again set to work, and in a short time produced a small bundle of bark manuscript, which he assured his wife was identical with the several armloads that she had destroyed. This only helped to confirm her opinion of his dementia. The syllabary was finished in 1821. It was the only alphabet in the whole world to be finished by one man, and was so complete that anyone understanding the Cherokee language, could, upon learning the eighty-six characters of this syllabary, read and write correctly. As a witness to its perfection, may be adduced the fact that no change, either by addition or elimination, has ever been found necessary.

He called his little daughter, A-yha-ka to him, and while his anxious wife watched them, he explained to the child the sound of each character, and in a few days the poor woman not only had a husband whose sanity she doubted, but her daughter claimed that she could make the leaf talk. The conjurers or medicine men were called in, and they, after swimming their beads and going through their incantations, declared that Sequoyah and A-yha-ka were possessed of the evil spirits and should be killed. The town chief (among whose other functions was that of justice and arbiter) of the community, was George Lowry, a half blood Scotch-Cherokee, a man who spoke both the Cherokee and English languages, had a meager English education, and had the love and respect of his neighbors on account of his wisdom and probity.

In order to confirm the edict of the medicine men it was necessary to secure the assent of the town chief. After having examined Sequoyah and the child as to their ability to make the paper "talk," Lowry said that it was his opinion that they were possessed of the spirits, and that possibly they should be killed. But at the same time he said that he did not wish to pass on the death penalty finally until a council had been held, that a popular verdict might be had. This gave general satisfaction. Ordinarily the older men in the community would have been called for such deliberations, but Lowry requested the young and implacable warriors of the Chicamauga towns to constitute this council. These were men that were continually at war, professional warriors, and Willstown, over which Lowry was town chief, was one of the six Chicamauga towns. These men were to sit on the jury to try a man that had the reputation of having been bewitched—the same crime that had been so summarily suppressed in New England.

They assembled, Lowry reiterated to them that most probably Sequoyah was possessed of the spirits, but that it behooved them to look closely into this case and try to ascertain its morits, as it might possibly be that it was the Good Spirit that had sent him to bless the people, and that if such was the fact, and they voted to kill him, the Good Spirit would most probably be very angry with them, and blight the nation. The inquisition began, the warriors listened to the master, and within one week each and every one could read and write. By this stroke, Sequoyah had thrown around him the proudest and fiercest aegis that ever escorted an original instructor.

He then established a school at his home, having for scholars, aged grandparents, their children and grandchildren, grave missionaries, painted warriors, who boasted between lessons of their bravery and prowess, white traders, many opulent and accomplished, cunning medicine men, who had lately been his most dangerous enemies, and half breeds, proud and imperious. They finished their educations generally in three or four days, and seldom more than a week. He afterwards visited other neighborhoods on his mission of education. By 1822, all of the Cherokee Nation (east) that cared to, had mastered his syllabary, and Sequoyah visited the Cherokees who were then living on their reservation between the Arkansas and White rivers, in Arkansas Territory. He removed his family to Arkansas in 1823.

The National council of the Cherokee Nation ("East") during its regular term in October, 1823, voted a silver medal to Sequoyah. It was made under the supervision of John Ross (who had been president of the National committee, when the award was voted) in Washington, D. C., where Ross was serving as a delegate for the Cherokee Nation ("East"). This medal bore on one side a bust, surrounded with the inscription, in English, "Presented to George Gist, by the General Council of the Cherokee Nation, for his ingenuity in the invention of the Cherokee Alphabet." On the reverse side was a couple of pipes with stems crossed, and encircled by the same inscription in Cherokee. It was intended that it should be presented in council, but on learning that Sequoyah intended to remain in the west, Chief Path-killer instructed John Ross to forward it to him, with a proper letter of transmission, which he did. Sequoyah wore the medal through life and it was buried with him.

The first Cherokee type were cast in Boston, and in the December number, 1827, of the Missionary Herald, appeared: Genesis 1, 1-5, in Cherokee, which was the first printing done in the Sequoyian characters. On February 21st, 1828, volume 1, number 1, of the Cherokee Phoenix, a weekly newspaper printed one-half in English and one-half in Cherokee, was published at New Echota, capitol of the Cherokee Nation ("East"). Elias Boudinot was editor. On May 8th, 1828, Sequoyah was one of the signers of the treaty between the United States and the western Cherokees, at Washington, D. C. It was during this visit that he sat for the painter, Charles B. King. He signed the "Act of union" between the eastern and western Cherokees, July 12th, 1839, as "President of the Western Cherokees," and on the following 6th of September he was one of the signers of the Cherokee constitution. On December 11th, 1841, the Cherokee council granted him a pension. In the spring of 1842, Sequoyah, his son Teesee, and seven others, started to the southwest. He died in August, 1843, near San Fernando de Taos, New Mexico.
